The infamous Apollo guidance computer is a device that not only had a role in space travel, but also was crucial to the success of many other space missions. Among its many tasks, it controlled the on-board guidance computers of the Moon landing modules in case they were to be lost, during reentry, or in the event of the Lunar Module landing off-course. Unfortunately, the computer used for the Apollo missions suffered from a control-programming error that enabled a small number of Apollo missions to miss the Moon. Because of the large number of lives at stake, the Apollo guidance computer was especially carefully designed with great attention to detail. It was a very sophisticated computer, using a bus that routed information using single wires. A program was written in assembly that controlled the computer. At that time, no personal computers existed. Instead, computers used direct input of the commands into the computer, and there was no other way to interact with the machine. In the end, these computers were used for a wide variety of space missions, including the Mars and Voyager missions. It's a testament to the amazing state-of-the-art technology of the 1970s. You can read more about the Apollo guidance computer here: Currently, the Mars Climate Orbiter is the only spacecraft that still uses Apollo guidance computers.
